Challenging Progress: Mob Violence and Punishing Identities in Modernist-Era American Fiction

Benjamin S. West

Indiana University of Pennsylvania

Follow this and additional works at: https://knowledge.library.iup.edu/etd

Recommended Citation
https://knowledge.library.iup.edu/etd/698

This Dissertation is brought to you for free and open access by Knowledge Repository @ IUP. It has been accepted for inclusion in Theses and Dissertations (All) by an authorized administrator of Knowledge Repository @ IUP. For more information, please contact sara.parme@iup.edu.
STUDENT HAS RESTRICTED ACCESS TO FULL TEXT OF THE DISSERTATION.

ONLY COVER PAGES AND ABSTRACT ARE AVAILABLE AT THIS TIME
CHALLENGING PROGRESS: MOB VIOLENCE AND PUNISHING IDENTITIES IN MODERNIST-ERA AMERICAN FICTION

A Dissertation
Submitted to the School of Graduate Studies and Research in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree
Doctor of Philosophy

Benjamin S. West
Indiana University of Pennsylvania
May 2010
We hereby approve the dissertation of

Benjamin S. West

Candidate for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

________________________
Dr. Ronald Emerick
Professor of English, Advisor

________________________
Dr. James M. Cahalan
Professor of English

________________________
Dr. Susan I. Gatti
Professor Emeritus of English

ACCEPTED

________________________
Dr. Timothy Mack
Dean
The School of Graduate Studies and Research
This study examines manifestations of mob violence in Modernist-era United States fiction, showing the ways in which mob violence is used as a literary trope to examine issues of racial, gender, national, and class identity. The first half of the twentieth century is full of mob violence in the U. S., from racially-motivated lynchings to violent confrontations resulting from labor unrest. In spite of the historical significance of this violence in the U. S., few attempts have been made to theorize mob and crowd behavior and their relationship to individual identity, especially in literary studies.

In many ways, Modernist-era U. S. fiction provides important theorization of mob violence. The writers and works discussed here consistently use mob violence to show the ways in which such violence is used to define and enforce individual identity in the United States at this time. James Weldon Johnson, William Faulkner, Richard Wright, Ernest Hemingway, F. Scott Fitzgerald, Willa Cather, and John Steinbeck depict numerous subjects suffering due to mob violence, violence faced because these subjects have transgressed against dominant notions of race, gender, class, and nationality. In doing so, these writers undermine the myth of progress in the U. S. at the time. This undermining of U. S. political, economic, and social systems shows these writers engaging with these issues in ways that have often been ignored, in part because many of these writers use Modernist-favored literary aesthetics. Especially important is the way that racially-motivated lynching, and the representation of such lynching in African-American literature and culture, becomes a noteworthy focus of canonical, white Modernist-era fiction.

This study makes an important connection between Modernist-era U. S. fiction and the prevalence of mob violence found during the period. These works provide significant contextualization and theorization of mob violence in the country, and display a cultural shift away from the myth of progress. By the end of the first half of the century, writers such as Faulkner and Steinbeck also begin to represent a post-Depression ideological shift, a shift away from depictions of individuals as subjected to mob violence to depictions of groups, such as sharecroppers and strikers, having their identities forcibly defined by powerful individuals.